user1
I

user1
While both sides can by hypocritical, I think Republicans are more. They always preach about family and rights, but they only like the rights that apply to them.

user1
For example, they like the right to life regarding abortion, but they don't want gun control or banning automatic weapons even though these things prevent others from a right to life.

user2
Republicans are the most hypocritical. Prime example is abortion. They want to save the lives of the unborn but don't care about the lives of the living.

user1
I agree, when they don't like something they say that the government is too intrusive and telling people what to do, but they are telling people not to have aboritions and that they can't choose.

user1
They are always complaining about government intervention when they use the government and the supreme court to limit rights and take rights away from others or even to ban books or ban places that supposedly teach CRT.

user2
Exactly, another example is the formula shortage. A large majority of republicans voted no on a bill to help get more formula to mothers and babies

user2
Agreed. It seems like they focus on the most trivial things and completely miss the big picture.

user1
I did not know that. That sounds hypocritical to me. Also, I remember when Obama wanted to nominate a Supreme Court justice before his term ended and a Republican senator said that it wouldn't be fair when in the past he completely changed his mind.

user2
Yes! I remember this now...was is Mitch McConnell?

user1
I don't think so, it might have been Lindsey Graham.

user2
Oh ok. think I remember hearing about it when they were trying to get Amy Coney Barrett nominated.

user1
They are also always for law and order, but on Jan. 6th they stood by and let the Capitol Police get abused.

user2
Overall it just feels like the rules don't apply to them, yet they want to decide how everyone else should live their lives.