user1: Hello

user2: Hello

user1: How are you today!

user2: I would have to say Republicans are more hypocritical. How can someone say they're pro-life when they won't support gun control or protect lives?

user2: I'm okay. How are you?

user2: Sorry. Jumping right into the conversation there.

user1: Fine. Ah - the shootings. NRA paying folks to push their agenda. Politics user2: It's not politics. I know that's what we're here to discuss, and that may be the elements of it, but it's lives. If you want to say you're protecting lives, you have to support legislation that does that.

user1: You assume the politicians are there for the people. They are enriching themselves while others suffer user2: Maybe we need something against giving money to senators or campaign funding from these sources, but whatever it is it needs to be done. Just being a Republican in office is hypocritical when you won't make the best choices for your constituents. And that's not supporting their gun rights.

user2: I don't disagree.

user2: My last statement goes toward that; by accepting an office where they represent the people, but then NOT representing the people, they are being hypocritical.

user2: Which do you think is more hypocritical? Democrats or Republicans user1: Good luck. I can't believe they reversed roe vs Wade. I wonder if they can keep religion out of politics along with common sense measures user2: They don't keep religion out at all. If they did they'd be more likely to preserve a woman's right to choose what happens with her body, rather than forcing her into a state that may be toxic or even dangerous for her.
